SOUTH WEST BUILDERS BECOME WHOLAGAN

The South-West builder responsible for some of the region's most coveted architecturally designed homes is taking on a whole new persona.

Formerly John Wholagan Building, the company's patriarch has appointed his two sons, Jamie and Tym, to manage the company into the future.

Mr Wholagan said the decision was a natural progression for the company, an opportunity to expand its architectural affiliates and become a little more public.

"Our company has been quietly working with architects to build some of the most beautiful homes in the South-West of Western Australia. We know that astute clients expect excellence and that is what we provide," he said.

"Wholagan has successfully cornered the market in prestige architecturally designed homes because it's what we choose to do. The company changes will enable us to expand our Architectural affiliates throughout the region and in Perth."

Together with the internal changes, the company has rebadged itself as simply 'Wholagan' and introduced a new look that reflects the portfolio of projects completed in the region over more than 20 years.

"We take on a small number of homes each year, so the same loyal team can move from site to site as required. This not only ensures that an extremely high standard of workmanship is maintained, it also provides confidence that we can fulfill our scheduled obligations," Mr Wholagan said.

“We have always been strongly focused on service and my sons have been a part of this process since they were a young age. It seems only natural for them to take on more responsibility, and it truly is a new and timely era for the company.”

Wholagan has received a series of MBA Awards and industry accolades for its work and has established relationships that allow them to guarantee the quality craftsmanship.

“Our portfolio and testimonials speak for themselves. It is extremely rewarding for me to know that the skilled work will continue into the future,” he said.
